On 2002/03/26, China launched an anti-dumping investigation into cold rolled steel products from Taiwan, South Korea, Russia, Ukraine and Kazakhstan. The investigation found Russia and all other countries guilty, and so China imposed anti-dumping tariffs on 2004/01/14. The sanctions expired on 2008/09/23, without Russia or any other countries having retaliated.

Narrative:

The initial onset of the episode began on 2002/03/26, when China's Ministry of Foreign Trade and Economic Cooperation announced the beginning of an anti-dumping investigation into the five countries' cold-rolled steel, following allegations from Chinese steel conglomerates.¹

The investigation found all countries involved guilty of dumping cold-rolled steel into the Chinese market, with China's Ministry of Commerce explaining that, "the ministry has decided that dumping of such products does exist, and has caused substantial damage."²

On 2003/09/23, China announced anti-dumping tariffs of up to 55 percent on cold rolled steel products from Taiwan, South Korea, Russia, Ukraine and Kazakhstan. They were imposed on 2004/01/14.³

Chinese steel company Wuhan Steel welcomed the decision, saying that, "the decision will have a positive impact on the company's operations and production."⁴ Other Chinese steel companies, such as Shanghai Baosteel Group Corporation and Anshan Iron & Steel Group, alongside the aforementioned Wuhan Steel, had lobbied China to open a probe into steel imports.⁵
