Narrative:

On 2022/12/08, Taiwan announced that China had barred shipments of squid, Pacific saury, fourfinger threadfin, and potentially other aquaculture products from Taiwan without warning.¹ Soon after, on 2022/12/10, it was announced that China had also banned imports of several Taiwanese beverages, including recognizable alcohol brands Taiwan Beer and Kinmen Kaoliang.²

The seafood restrictions were likely to cause significant damage to the industry, representing a loss of roughly $166.5 million.³ The effect of the alcohol bans was anticipated to be smaller.⁴ China claimed the policies were put in place because suppliers had failed to correctly register their products.⁵ Commentary from the time suggested that the bans were actually an attempt to persuade Taiwanese voters to support the Kuomintang (KMT) above the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP).⁶ The KMT is generally more willing to cooperate with the Chinese government than the DPP.

On 2023/01/23, China announced that most of the beverage and seafood restrictions would be lifted after Taiwanese representatives met with Chinese officials.⁷
